

At first glance, Andrew Ciccone seems like a typical fifth grade student at Marlboro's Asher Holmes Elementary School. He's captain of the Marlboro Mustangs Recreational program's JV wrestling team. He plays Marlboro Youth Football. He's interested in archery, fishing, and basketball.

He also happens to be an up-and-coming quad motocross rider.

"Andrew is an intelligent, determined, and articulate young man," says his father, Joseph. "He has the physical attributes (he's both small and strong) that make him a natural for this sport." In 2007, at the age of nine, Andrew completed his first racing season at ATCO Motocross Park in Atco, New Jersey, finishing second place in the 90 Mod Production 8 to 15 class. He has not only achieved a very successful racing record in a short period of time, but he has also been named as an APEX Quad Factory Supported Rider.

There's no doubt that Andrew is an extremely active young man. He competes in large scale wrestling matches, plays football, and still makes time for giving back to the community. He has, for example, participated in the MX Kids Racing for Hope to Benefit Kids with Cancer since its inception in 2006. Last year this charitable race event was held at Raceway Park in Englishtown, raising over $40,000 in the fight against cancer.

With the support of his parents Joseph and Caryn, and siblings, Arianna and Joseph III, Andrew strives to be "the whole package," taking advice from his mother. He's working to become a straight "A" student and to be a good friend, even as he moves forward as a competitive athlete.

Andrew says he appreciates all of the efforts made on his behalf by his parents, family, sponsors, and friends to help him remain focused on reaching his goals. And, we'll all be keeping an eye on him as he continues to grow into the racing motocross success that may be his destiny.
